XII. Open Forum:

Dr. Mora’s Visit

Began a formal primary focus to promote increase graduation rates.
Trying to figure out how to improve how to improve graduation rates. What they came up with was something called achieving a dream.
What they are deciding on doing is a line of strategies, committed faculties and student affairs including engagement from the students like Sga and all the clubs.
Statistically those who stay involved will graduate, which is national data. Statistically students that don’t come to class two consecutive days means that it could be a sign of drop out, so they have an early alert system
Getting students out of remediation sooner is a key, so they have established a new program called ALP, ALP program, where they get extra help. They also have boot camp for those who have to take the placement test. And with that they will be in a class for a week to prep them, touring to help them take the test, and its free to do the boot camp.
Drop out rates are more connected to finances then learning, which means that students aren’t aware on how to finance their school finance. Career planning, there is a formal way to do so. We have advisors that are specialized to help students do this. The idea on how to do so is go through a process of self evaluation, reading reflection, and talking to an expert. What it is that your good at, and what it is that you like. If you have those three you will have the right career.

A lot of drop outs is from students that don’t have a career path, and they may have the money but they end up changing their career all the time. Student that go through career planning are most likely to complete and graduate.

The key for community college students is for them to get 30 credits, once a students gets that in one year their graduation rates soar. Also going to be building a new student center, student success center, and will also have it at the other campuses. There are strategies involved in complement for all the college students and we try to be affordable and always accessible.

ACE is going to Niagara Falls and wanted to know if any of the clubs would like to go. If you do contact some one from ACE to get more information.
